CHINESE IN THE RING.

Rattling Prize Fight Between Celestials in Which the Best Wins.

It Only Lasted For Four Rounds But it Was a Rattler While in Progress.

Everything Goes Among the Heathen Save Biting-Description of Glang, the Chinese John Sullivan.

by the 105-pound Glang that he has not yet recovered. There was only one man in the troupe who sympathized with Lee Toy, and that was Foo Jung. He is the head acrobat of the show, and has been known to turn thirty back somersaults in succession. He felt so bad over the thrashing administered to the manager that he concluded to fight Ah Glang. The fight took place late, on the second floor of No. 4 Mott street, New York. The fighters were equal in height, for both could walk under a string 5 feet from the floor and never touch a hair, but Jung had a slight advantage in weight. They appeared in full ring costume, so carefully arranged that the business of dressing occupied three-quarters of an hour. Each of Glang's legs were wrapped in about fifteen yards of black tweed an inch wide. His green silk blouse was sleeveless, but tight-fitting, and his arms were bare. Half a dozen yards of soft cotton material was twisted, turban-like, around his head, and his feet were incased in thin sandals bound with thongs. Foo Jung was similarly attired, but the color of the goods was different. Light blue strips incased his nether limbs, and his blouse was old gold. Handshaking at the beginning of the bout was dispensed with, and as soon as Tee Chan, master of ceremonies, shouted "Li Gah foh," they were at it. Jung reached for Glang's face with both hands. In an instant he was seized by one wrist and made to spin around like a top, and as he came face about he received a swinging right-hander on the chin bone, and a kick, which was lamoed by the agile Glang somewhere under the right armpit. It was almost a knock out at the start, for as he fell to his knees, Glang rushed at him and struck him under the chin with his knee. He fell over backward, and the few spectators on the stools signified their approval: "Ho sho shay." The acrobat began to realize that his lines were cast in hard places, and he became rather wary. He advanced with one hand outstretched, with the other on guard. Several times he struck at his opponent, but each time the blows were cleverly warded. No attempt was made to counter. It seemed as though these tactics were unknown. Suddenly Glang saw an opening. He rushed in, and, using both hands, struck Jung a succession of clows on the ribs. Then dropping to his knees he attempted to butt Jung in the stomach. Here the ability of the acrobat was brought into play. Lightly he cleared the kneeling form at a bound, and almost at the same instant one foot touched the floor the heel of the other landed on Glang's side with a force that was remarkable. Glang arose quickly, but he had no sooner regained hi full ring costume, so carefully arranged that the business of second round, his superior knowledge of fighting asserted itself. He kicked, cuffed, punched and butted the unfortunate Jung unmereifully. His movements were so rapid that no note could be made of them. He was like a bundle of steel springs, which shot out an arm here or a leg there at will.

a kick back of the knee joint would send him rolling over and over. The movements of the fighters were intensely scientific. Most of the fighting was done at close range, and the rapid motions of Glang's arms as they moved about in self defense were audibly commented on.

In the fourth round Ah Glang got in his "pretty work." as pugilistic stang would express it, and put Jung to sleep for eighteen seconds. With a pile-driving blow in the back of the neck he sent Jung down on his knees, and then with the agility of a cat sprang into the air and planted the toes of both feet under his adversary's chin. squarely in the throat. That settled Jung. He was completely knocked out in the most scientific celestial fashion. At the conclusion of the fight Ah Glang was patted on the back by his friends, while the defeated Jung was entirely ignored. Glang walked nonchalantly toward a table, picked up a package of cigarettes, took one himself, offered one to Jung, and the battle was at an end. In his own peculiar style, Glang is looked upon by his countrymen as the Chinese John L. Sullivan. He has been known to defend himself successfully from the attacks of four men, and it is said, as an evidence of his agility, that he can defeat a man who is armed with a sword. The Chinese boxing roles will allow a man to do everything but bite. The only unfair advantage which can be taken of an opponent is to hit or kick him when he is down, Everything else is all right. The fighting costumes are very costly. The one which Glang wore to-day was worth $150. The value lies in the strength and quality of the material, which is all woven by hand.

shot out an arm here or a leg there at will.
Half a dozen times Jung went to the floor, and as many times he arose only to return again. Frequently he cleared Glang's head at a bound to evade certain punishment, but no sooner would he gain the floor than a kick back of the knee joint would send him rolling over and over. The movements of the fighters were intensely scientific.

Women and the Saloons.

LATHROP, Mo., Feb. 12.- At a mass meeting yesterday resolutions were adopted endorsing the course of action pursued by the women who last week destroyed all the saloons in town, and assuring them that they would in the future have the moral and financial support of the citizens of the country. While the meeting was in progress the announcement was made from the rants sworn out for forty-five women and nine men who participated in the raid. Rev. Pierce denounced the violators of law and said the officers would not dare arrest the women; that when they (the officers) should have plucked the feathers from their bodies, the women would be ready to undergo their punishment, intimating that the officers would be tarred and feathered should they attempt to make the arrests.

blood you cannot enjoy good health. At this season nearly every one needs a good medicine to purify, vitalize, and enrich the blood, and Hood's Sarsaparilla is worthy your confidence.
